It was a trip I'll never forget. Around a year ago I decided to take my family out in to the nature. And it turned out to be one of the most bizarre trips I have ever taken.

When I proposed this idea to my wife Kate she almost instantly agreed to it, saying: "Ofcourse, its a great idea to take Sarah out and teach her the basics of survival!" But when I asked Sarah if she wants to go out, she refused, saying: "No, I want to stay at home and watch cartoons. Its way more fun then going outdoors." I was completely taken aback by her response. But I would not give up so easily. And so I started to ask her that same question over and over again every day, untill she finally agreed to it.

And so, on the morning of next day we started packing. It took us a couple of hours, but we were finally ready to go camping. After a few hours on the road we finally reached our destination, a small camping site near a creek, to wich I used to go camping when I was little. It was a bewildering sight. Somehow that spot stayed untouched since the last time I was out there. There were bushes and trees almost everywhere. When we exited the car Kate and I were shocked by its beauty. But unfortunately Sarah did not share the same opinion. She was confused by our behaviour. And for the majority of time that we spent there she did not smile even once. She hated everything about camping, and did not want to turn the
